“The Determinants of Homeownership across Space”

In this paper, we employ a new instrumental variable strategy to identify the causal effect of the accommodation type on the housing tenure choice. According to our estimates, a ten percentage points increase in the share of multi-family housing causes the homeownership rate to decrease by eight percentage points. Because housing is durable, this very tight relationship has important long-run consequences for the location choices of homeowners, and hence for local inequality within and between cities. Two complementary theoretical mechanisms likely explain this result: A landlord production efficiency advantage, and a coordination failure for owner-occupiers in multi-family housing.
